“The Descent”

I chose this path, the downward turn, the narrow gauntlet of obsidian air choked with whispers and a weight most souls cannot endure. It is a road open to any warrior, yet the many who attempt it become the few who remain.

The failures speak of a light, a microscopic luminescence, a needle in the void. One must have faith that the spark exists, for if the eye loses the flicker, the darkness consumes the bone. Success is futile then. Many have perished here.

I started many moons ago. I have been bitten by the wickedness of this place, wounded and weary, enduring the unendurable. I have not seen the light in weeks. A cold fear grows, were the warnings true? Was I naive to dismiss the ghosts of those who turned back? I stepped off the map knowing the risks, I told my family goodbye, and now their absence is a physical blade I carry in my side.

I am slowing. The dark is thick as a tar. I worry my body will break before my mind, but isolation has already split me in two. I am a house divided, the silence has birthed a second self, and the voice that remains sounds exactly like mine, but it speaks with the rhythm of a funeral bell.

“Rest” it purrs, a velvet weight on my soul. “The light was a lie told by the proud. You are no warrior, just a man drowning in a hole he dug himself.”

It lists my sins like a merchant’s ledger. It uses my own memories to sharpen its teeth. The internal dialogue is my truest opponent, though it takes its toll, I crawl forward.

I do not trust the stillness. I speak aloud to shatter the spell, my voice a dry rattle in the hollow of my throat, “I have to find that light.”

The path turns to silt and quicksand now. I ignore the inner choir of chaos begging for my surrender. I shout over the rot in my head, “I have to find that light!”

The earth is at my waist. I am an anchor in the deep now. The voices can no longer be drowned out, they are the only air left to breathe. I am stuck, sinking, with no choice but to listen to my own undoing. Terrified, I attempt one last cry against the crushing black, “I have to find that light!”

The voices go silent, the sand claims my mouth, my eyes, my breath. I am consumed by the darkness. As my senses fail and my pulse grows still, a flash, there it is, a spark, I smile into the crush of the earth, I finally found it.
